Ann Murdock and Hale Hamilton
in "A Pair of Sixes."

New York, March 28.—The Longacre Theater holds "A Pair of Sixes"—and draws a full house every evening. This small pair is one of the best theatrical hands dealt in New York this season.

Two partners in the pill-making industry can't agree; a lawyer suggests they settle their disputes with a hand of poker, the loser to keep away from the offices, and act as the other's house servant for a year.

George Nettleton, who invented the pill, wins, with the sixes. T. Bobbs Johns, who devised the coating and colored the pill a delicate violet hue, loses, and becomes plain Boggs, butler, for his triumphant partner.

At first it's awful for Johns. Nettleton makes his life a torment. Nettleton is married, Boggs isn't. Nettleton invites Boggs' fiancée to his house for a week. Under the contract, if either partner tells any third party what's up, he loses his whole interest in the pill.

Johns' fiancée comes, and screams in horror when she beholds him in buttons and side whiskers. Johns squirms in silent agony. Nettleton
